CAN TELEGRAPH BY TYPEWRITER

GREAT INVENTION PROVES TO BE A SUCCESS

Process of Transmitting Messages Is Simplified So that Any Keyboard Operator Can Be an Expert

From the Chicago Tribune.

The end sought by hundreds of inventors has been attained. The typewriter telegraph at last is a reality—a proven success. Nothing more important has been known to the telegraph world since Edison introduced the quadruplex than is this apparatus, which is the product of the brain of John C. Barclay, assistant general manager of the Western Union Telegraph company, and for many years one of the Western Union officials in Chicago.

For two weeks the instrument has been in use on the New York-Buffalo circuit. Within the next month or so it will be working on the Chicago-New York circuits. Before 1905 is six months old every big trunk line of the telegraph system of the Western Union will be equipped with the new device.

All sorts of improvements may be made in the Barclay machine, but as it stands today it carries out every claim of the inventor. Any person who can manipulate a keyboard can operate it—can, by simply touching the keys, print messages at the other end of the wire. Knowledge of telegraphy is not essential. Accuracy of transmission is dependent only on accuracy in touching the keys.

Hundred Words a Minute

The inventor says the speed of the typewriter telegraph is limited only to the speed at which a person can manipulate the keys of a typewriter. One hundred words a minute is easy. A few days ago, without making any particular attempt to "speed up," a man at a typewriter in Buffalo sent 324 messages to New York in four hours. There was not an error in any one of these 324 telegrams. Capitalization, punctuation and every detail of spelling was followed absolutely.

The Barclay apparatus is extremely simple in its operation. The sending operator manipulates a typerwriting machine which is "in circuit." This is not a synchronous system, but the sending of the signals preserves the proper relation of the sending and the receiving apparatus. At the receiving end the messages are printed in page form on ordinary telegraph blanks, the blanks being fed to the receiver as they are needed. A detailed description of the device is withheld until patent rights abroad, for which application has been made by Mr. Barclay, are granted.

Effect on Morse Operators

Mr. Barclay believes that his invention will go a long way toward eliminating the Morse operators. Other men who are high up in the telegraph business do not think as he does. The new machine unquestionably will bring about one of the greatest economics the Western Union company has had in a score of years, for with it one man can do what four now are doing, and these four the most expert in the business.

In times when there are no weather disturbances on the circuit the service will be practically automatic. There will be no necessity for receiving operators other than a general supervisor to see that everything is going all right. That the use of the system will be restricted to trunk lines is almost certain. There would be little economy in introducing it on local wires.

Company Owns Invention

One of the queer things about the new invention is that it will not bring two cents of profit to Mr. Barclay unless the Western Union Telegraph company chooses to be generous to him. His device may be worth millions of dollars to the corporation, but he does not own it. Because he is the employe of the company and is under agreement to give all the products of his brain to his employers this, the greatest of his inventions, is the property of the corporation. He has worked out his idea on the time of the company and they own it.

There are some men high up in electrical circles who say that Mr. Barclay is the best man the Western Union has ever had. This is high praise when it is considered that Edison has been under contract with the Western Union for twenty-five or thirty years. Unquestionably, however, Mr. Barclay has done more in the last two years to bring the Western Union service up to date than was done by any other man since the days of Edison's greatest activity.

His success has been so great that he is now practically second in command of the great system. He was born in Greensburg, Pa., on April 17, 1856. Like Col. Clowry, president of the Western Union, he has risen from the ranks of messenger boys. He has the distinction of having been a messenger boy under Andrew Carnegie when Carnegie was a "plug" operator. Every position in the telegraph field, from messenger up to the one he now holds, has been filled by Mr. Barclay. He gets a salary of $10,000 or $12,000 a year and is content with that.

PETS OF THE RICH LOADED WITH GIFTS

Santa Claus Provided Rubber Boots for Delicate Pugs and Poodles

From the Washington Post.

Although not generally known, it is true that dogs, cats, parrots and canaries receive about as many and as expensive Christmas presents as children. Just before Christmas the principal leather goods and animal stores of this city laid in a big supply of gorgeous cages, fancy globes and aquariums, dog trappings galore—in short, everything that could possibly add to the comfort or enhance the beauty of a thoroughbred French bull or Boston terrier, goldfish or canary. Then for several days before Christmas these stores were filled with portly, prosperous bachelors and elderly spinsters, declaring that "Polly must have a new cage for Christmas," or "My goldfish will feel sad if I don't buy them a new globe," and so on, each person talking as though his cat or canary, goldfish or poodle was a thing possessed of human desires and sensibilities.

Farther east, where such goods are manufactured, the makers and dealers are constantly devising some new thing to catch the eye and open the purse-strings of lovers of animals, and this year they succeeded in placing on the market something entirely new and original. For the past three years dealers have furnished the owners of pugs and poodles with curious little leather bootees, which they place on the feet of their pets in damp weather. They are made of red morocco leather, and look quite attractive, but as a matter of fact afford no protection whatever during rainy or snowy weather, sufficing merely for periods of damp or cold.

Now there are some people who like to have their dogs with them at all times, yet who in the past have been obliged to leave them at home for fear Fido or Tige would contract pneumonia or something worse by being out in the wet. The need for better canine foot protection passed therefore from the owners of pets to the dealers, who in turn notified the manufacturers, the result being that the latter placed on the market this Christmas a lot of canine rubber boots, well made, with thick, heavy soles, and thoroughly impervious to water. A dog furnished with a couple of pairs of such rubber boots may splash about in the mud and snow to its heart's content without running the risk of catching cold, and thus it happens a great burden and anxiety is lifted from the minds of kind-hearted bachelors and maiden ladies.

Notwithstanding the exetreme care which some people take of their pets, there are few things a dog hates more than to wear these ridiculous little boots. Some dogs rebel outright, while others are made to wear them only after a deal of coaxing and persuasion. Even those pampered pugs and poodles that have been accustomed to wearing such footgear would much prefer to be without them, and whenever their owners start out for a walk they are first obliged to have a tussle with Fido, who enters all sorts of protests to wearing boots that prevent him from using his nails and pawing up the earth and snow. Moreover, such footgear renders the creatures that wear them all the more susceptible to colds and illness but, of course, it would be impossible to convince the average dog-loving bachelor of this fact, who thinks his dog requires as much care as himself.

The introduction of dog boots was due to the Italian organ grinders of the eastern cities, who place shoes on their monkeys, a species of South American cebus that is very hardy and can stand almost any kind of cold weather if well fed and clothed and protected from the damp, but the dog is essentially a northern animal, and does not require such protection. It is even doubtful whether in the case of monkeys the wearing of shoes is of any benefit, for it has been noticed in the Berlin zoo where these monkeys run in and out in all sorts of weather, that they seldom contract pneumonia.

BELIEVES ANIMALS REASON

Lord Avebury Relates Instances to Prove Contentions

Lord Avebury, better known as Sir John Lubbock, the celebrated naturalist, writes: "If many are prone to exaggerate the intellectual powers of dogs and horses and elephants, others go to the opposite extreme. Descartes, we know, looked on animals as mere automata. Even recently Bethe, Uexkull and other writers have denied the existence of any psychic powers, at any rate, in invertebrate animals, which they explain as reflex machines.

"I confess, indeed, that I cannot understand how anyone who loves animals, or ever has devoted any study to them, can doubt that they possess some power of reason. Many of their actions are unconscious and instinctive, so are some of ours, as we may see by watching a child, but practice enables us to walk or run almost automatically.

"Mr. Gladstone told me that once when he was forming one of his governments he had some difficulty in arranging the places. He and Mrs. Gladstone wrote down the titles of the offices and the names of the liberal leaders on pieces of paper and tried all the evening, but in vain, to fit them together. At last they gave it up and went to bed.

"When Mr. Gladstone awoke in the morning everything was satisfactorily arranged in his head; his brain had worked it out for him during his sleep. This was not conscious reason and certainly was not instinctive. Dr. Carpenter gave to such action the name of unconscious cerebration."

In further proof that man does many things almost automatically Lord Avebury gives this incident: "I have been for over forty years a director of a company which changed its offices twenty years ago, and I have not since had any occasion to enter our old house. One morning this summer, however, I was going to a committee in our present house, but, thinking of other things, I walked past our door and two or three intervening houses and into the porch of our old office."

During the past year there were 47,539 men and 14,147 women employed in the shops of Detroit and Wayne county, Michigan. The average wage for the men fas $1.94; for the women, $1.09.
